Adinkra is the name given to colorful, hand-stamped and hand-embroidered cloths used for mourning and other special occasions by the Akan people of Ghana and Côte d'Ivoire (the Ivory Coast). Symbolic symbols called adinkra symbols are printed onto these cloths. Used for mourning, the symbols express the wearer's feelings and sentiment about the deceased person. Used for other special occasions, the symbols convey such messages as love, respect, bravery, faith and hope.

Adinkra literally means "to print, to stamp or to mark". In the language of the Akan people, who comprise about one-third of the population of Ghana, Adinkra cloth symbols have been in use for hundreds of years and constitutes an ancient African system of verbal and visual language. The symbols are figurative and stylized geometric images that embody specific messages. Some of the symbols express the legendary history of the Akan people, and others are cultural metaphors and allusions about philosophy, myths, legends, beliefs, rituals and social values. They contain well-known messages on profound truths. They provide a framework of moral virtues and lessons for the good life. They emphasize the Akan world view and their quest for truth and righteousness in the world.

The stamp designs are made from carved calabashes which are stamped into a specially made ink, called adinkra aduro (aduro means ink). The designs are then stamped onto a variety of colored cotton cloths to be worn for all occasions.
